

Information for Authors on Obtaining Figure Reuse Permission from Publishers

Scenarios

• Figures reproduced from publications of which none of the current authors is also an author usually require permission from the publisher, with some exceptions. This permission line appears in the figure caption.

• Figures reproduced from publications of which one or more of the authors is also an author of the current paper need only “Reprinted from Authors names.<sup>Ref</sup>” in the caption. Permission is often not needed from the publisher; Biomaterials Translational staff will investigate. Exceptions: EPJ, IOP (see below).

• During PPR, staff should compare “adapted” figures with their original counterparts. If the figures are either identical or very similar, then they are considered to be “reprinted” and therefore require permission from the original article’s publisher as usual. If the figures differ from each other, then they are considered to be “adapted.” Figures adapted from figures in previous publications (i.e., the current figure is a significant modification of the original) do not require permission. These figures are considered to be new figures. In that case, the caption should not explicitly mention permission, e.g., “Adapted from XXX et al.<sup>5</sup>” is fine, but “Adapted with permission from XXX et al.<sup>5</sup>” is not, because we do not wish to imply that someone has expressly given permission either to reproduce the figure or to make the adaptation.

General Notes

• Permission lines appear at the end of the captions. If figure parts are taken from different publications, each permission line can appear after the part description, or grouped at the end, e.g., “(a), (c), reprinted from.... (b) Reprinted from....”

• If a caption explicitly notes that the figure was obtained from another publication, then the permission line is needed. It should be assumed by the copyeditor that all permissions have been received by Biomaterials Translational unless the Special Instructions indicate otherwise.

Permissions Text for Specific Publishers

Note: “Ref” indicates where the reference number should appear, e.g., “34.” Also, author names are expressed as they are in the main text – one author, surname; two authors, surname with “and”; more than two authors, first surname and et al.
